

I am very much against relaxing the restrictions on media ownership that may be considered by the FCC (e.g., increasing the number or percentage of TV or radio stations a single company can own and operate). If anything, the restrictions should be made tighter. I have witnessed the disastrous results of the previous round of media ownership relaxations, an example of which is the tremendous decline in the quality of the radio stations in the Denver area after Clearchannel bought many of them up some years ago. There is no way that Clearchannel's effect in Denver can be considered in the public interest. If the FCC does not intend to fix the problem of too many media outlets owned by too few companies, they should at least not compound the problem. Question: what ideals and vision do you have for America?
